Author Voice:

The Iron Man was a story for his own small children, and that he later wrote it out just as he had told it over three or four nights. He described the story as "like a kit or blueprint for putting together a little boy", and he said that he felt he should tell his children stories to make things possible for them; stories that allowed them to win. He described The Iron Man as bringing the boy into a friendly relationship with the mysterious world of technology and machines in such a way that he can control it. And, in the "creature from space", he said, "you have the terrible, possibly demonic world of what comes up from inside, out of the elements" and the boy and the Iron Man are "brought into a workable relationship with that, too."

"If you're all so peaceful up there, how did you get such greedy and cruel ideas?"
The dragon was silent for a long time after this question. And at last he said: "It just came over me. I don't know why. It just came over me, listening to the battling shouts and the war-cries of the earth - I got excited, I wanted to join in."
